

TRANSPLANT RECIPIENT

Animal research and testing has played a significant role in the development of anti-rejection medications. Immunosuppressive agents are designed to prevent the rejection of transplanted organs and tissues. Researchers depend on white rats – and other research animals – in their ongoing quest to help suppress the immune system’s response to a new organ.